His unique and innovative style enthralled fans all over the world, and his performances didn't disappoint.

Early Life

Jimi Hendrix was born in Seattle in 1942, and he was raised by his father. His mother was known to struggle with family issues. He lived in a poor neighborhood, and he loved playing the guitar from the time he was a young boy. He never even considered going to college, so he joined the US Army after high school. In 1961, this was a productive path by which a poor black man could make a good living.

Jimi Hendrix spent a year with the Paratroopers before breaking his ankle on a jump. As a result, he was discharged from duty, and he started playing with R&B bands. In fact, he went on tour with many different well-known bands, including the Isley Brothers, Little Richard, and more in the Chitlin' Circuit, which was an association of African American dance clubs in the Eastern and Southern parts of the United States. Hendrix learned from some of the best in the industry during this time.

His Rise to Fame

During these years, Hendrix developed his unique and flamboyant style. Although he wore a suit on stage, he was known to wear thick chains and a peacock feather in his hat. He was a charismatic performer who was friendly and approachable, although some said he was shy. In addition to his charm, he was ambitious and wanted to succeed.

Hendrix was part of the hippie scene long before it was trendy, and he lived in Greenwich Village. People did a lot of drinking, and Hendrix was known to have outbursts of rage when he was drinking.

To the UK and Back

During this time, Jimi Hendrix was discovered by a British talent scout, Chas Chandler. He flew Hendrix to London and created a band called the Jimi Hendrix Experience. They merged American and British blues styles with R&B and Rock, which led to the unique style of Hendrix.

Not only were they successful in the UK, but they returned to America and were an instant sensation. He had one of his greatest performances at the Monterey Pop Festival in 1967 where he solidified his place as an American legend.

A Musician All the Time

Jimi Hendrix was an incredible performer, and he was legendary to watch on the stage. He was obsessed with his music in his private life as well, often writing music any chance he could. He set up the $1 million dollar studio called the Electric Lady Studio.

He continued to write and record his music, and he performed all of the time. In 1969 after performing at Woodstock, he achieved Global fame. His last performance was in 1970, and he tragically died later in London on September 18, 1970. He had taken some sleeping pills to combat insomnia, and the prescription was larger than he expected.
