Ageless Habits: What Men and Women Can Learn from Each Other About Skincare

Our Friends · Wednesday, September 17th, 2025

Walk into almost any store and you'll notice the divide: one aisle lined with pastel bottles promising radiance and renewal, another filled with darker packaging touting strength and efficiency. It can give the impression that men's and women's skincare exist in two completely separate worlds.

In reality, skin health is built on the same foundations for everyone — cleansing, hydrating, and protecting against damage. Biology plays a role, of course. What's interesting is how habits have developed differently across genders and how much value there is in sharing those habits.

Men's vs. Women's Skin

Men's skin tends to be thicker, oilier, and slower to show visible aging, while women's skin is more sensitive to hormonal changes and often experiences dryness sooner.

- Thickness: Men's skin is about 20–25% thicker than women's, largely due to higher testosterone levels.
- Oil Production: Men produce more sebum, which can mean oilier skin but also a slower appearance of fine lines.
- Aging Patterns: Women often see earlier signs of dryness and wrinkles, especially around menopause when estrogen drops.
- Pore Size: Men typically have larger pores, which makes them more prone to blackheads and requires more targeted exfoliation.
- Sensitivity: Women's skin tends to be more reactive to hormonal shifts, leading to breakouts or dryness at certain times of the month.

These differences influence product choice, but they don't change the fundamentals (to cleanse, hydrate, protect, and repeat). When men borrow some of the preventative and consistent practices common in women's routines, and women adopt a bit of men's practicality and focus, the result is usually the most sustainable (and effective) approach.

What Women Often Do Well

Consistency is a major strength. Many women begin caring for their skin earlier in life, which makes practices like cleansing, moisturizing, and applying sunscreen second nature. That preventative mindset means fewer issues build up over time.

Women also tend to embrace layering products. Not in a complicated, 10-step sense, but in targeted ways. A vitamin C serum for brightness paired with a moisturizer for hydration is a good example. Each product does its job without needing to do it all.

Finally, women often demonstrate greater adaptability. Seasonal shifts, travel, or hormonal changes lead them to swap moisturizers, adjust exfoliation frequency, or change product weights. This flexibility helps the skin stay balanced instead of stuck in a routine that no longer fits.

What Men Often Do Well

Men's skincare routines are typically straightforward, and that simplicity is powerful. A consistent two- or three-step system can outperform an elaborate plan that's too difficult to maintain.

Daily grooming also plays a role. Shaving acts as exfoliation, clearing away dead skin cells and encouraging renewal. With proper aftercare — like a calming balm or lightweight moisturizer — shaving supports smoother, healthier skin without adding extra steps.

Another strength is the embrace of practical tools. Products like derma rollers appeal to men because they provide visible results without complicating a routine. Used correctly, they improve circulation, boost absorption of serums, and even support beard and scalp health.

Where the Routines Overlap

The most effective routines usually pull from both sides. Men can benefit from women's emphasis on prevention, especially daily SPF, antioxidants like vitamin C, and adjusting products seasonally. Women, on the other hand, often find value in cutting back on unnecessary steps and focusing on what really moves the needle.

Tools like a derma roller are a great example of this overlap. For women, microneedling enhances absorption of serums and encourages circulation. For men, it supports beard growth and skin repair. The tool isn't tied to one gender and is simply helpful for anyone who wants healthier skin and hair.

Breaking Down the Divide

The gap between "men's" and "women's" skincare is shrinking. More brands are offering gender-neutral lines, and routines are becoming increasingly similar. Men are trying serums and masks, while women are streamlining their routines into simple kits.

Yes, there are biological differences that still matter: men's thicker skin often tolerates stronger exfoliants, while women may need gentler options during certain hormonal phases. But those distinctions are much smaller than the marketing labels suggest. At the end of the day, most people's skin thrives on the same mix of protection, hydration, and consistency.

Learning From Each Other

If you take one lesson from this divide, let it be this: there's real value in borrowing habits.

• For men: Start prevention earlier. Daily sunscreen, antioxidants, and small seasonal adjustments can help keep skin healthier in the long term.

• For women: Simplify where possible. A handful of high-quality products used consistently will usually outperform a cluttered shelf of half-used bottles.

Blending these strengths creates a routine that's both effective and sustainable — forward-looking without being overwhelming.

Final Thoughts

Skincare isn't about gender. It's about biology, habits, and the way you care for yourself over time. Men and women may start from different approaches, but the goals are the same: healthier, more resilient skin.

Borrow consistency, borrow simplicity, and don't hesitate to try tools or techniques outside your usual aisle. The best skincare routine is the one that fits your life, keeps you confident, and supports your skin year after year.
