Late Inning Reliever

This grandson, the youngest of six, has an arm like a closer. It's a cannon as the scouts say and keeps the batters on their toes. Just this morning, he bounced a baseball off my head, a cloth baseball made for toddlers for such an occasion.

At this age he's effectively wild and leaves a trail of broken pottery and dented wallboards.
I want to coach the art of chin music. Better to keep the school bullies guessing, dusting back the hot shots who crowd the plate and spit sunflower seeds at the mound. His parents will polish good manners and clean sportsmanship.

It's what mothers and fathers do, and should if he is ever to learn command. As a grandfather who has grown old with the game, I'd like to keep him a little wild with a rising fastball, one that's valuable in the late innings with the meat of the lineup tapping their spikes, if he can broadcast his disarming smile and his let's-see-what-happens-next eyes.

Lighting the First Cigar

I walk across the yard with a ladder over my shoulder.

It swings through the morning air like the prow of ship, a slow sweep turning towards the house, weather-beaten and peeling with time. The rungs are wet with last night's rain. My shoes squeak in climbing to the eaves.

Mrs. Brown is cooking bacon.
The smell rises two stories through a louver in the attic and catches like an apron on a nail.

Reluctant to begin the day, I balance myself with the robins and the jays and wait for someone else within me to dip the brush into the paint.

Huckleberries

We purchased plastic baskets of huckleberries from a roadside market and nibbled them in the car as we drove west across Montana.

This was a day when we could find nothing wrong in our lives. The old Toyota purred under the big sky as it is called. Our children were eating lunch in their homes back in Kansas.

We sent them photos of the snow capped peaks near Whitefish. The dog stretched out along the back seat with nothing in mind except togetherness. It felt as if we could drive for days without stopping. The berry baskets, even though plastic and cheap, would replenish themselves without effort like luck or fortune.

As the season wanes, we only need to wind higher into the mountains with cinnamon bears who eat as they gather while there is time, while there is still purple found before sleep.
