Anita Pulier: Three Poems

Anita Pulier · Wednesday, November 2nd, 2016

After retiring from her law practice, Anita Pulier served as a U. S. representative for the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom at the United Nations. Her chapbooks Perfect Diet and The Lovely Mundane were published by Finishing Line Press. Anita's poems have appeared both online and in print in many journals, including Riverbabble, Fjords, Evening Street Review, Cultural Weekly, LA Times, Askew, Linnet's Wings, Oberon, Avalon Literary Review, Extracts, Daily Dose of Lit and The Buddhist Poetry Review. Anita's work is included in the forthcoming anthology Grabbing The Apple. Anita and her husband split their time between Manhattan's Upper West Side and Los Angeles.

Knit One Purl Two

For Sima
 You get a call your brother died.
 You retreat, bury yourself under the fluff of blankets, sheets, he stays dead.
 Tears coat your aging skin,
 still dead.
 You begin telling family, friends, co-workers.
 They wait for you to orchestrate what's next, what follows dead.
 You need time.
 Knit one, purl two,
 maybe he will walk through that door once more so you can be five or ten or twelve or fifteen gifting a scarf you made for him before he left home leaving you behind,
 knit one, purl two,
 where you held close the feeling that as long as he was somewhere, you were okay.
 Now, this very minute,

you need him to be somewhere.
 (cable stitch, twist stitch)
 Instead, he is dead,
 You have lost count,
 loose strands appear,
 you pull on one
 everything unravels.
 You crawl out of bed gripping a single ropery thread.
 Children, grandchildren, friends call,
 show up, make noise.
 The thread is surprisingly elastic.
 You wrap it tightly around your hand, your head, your spine, it moves easily with you from bed to kitchen, keeps you upright,
 redefines survival,
 you drink juice.

Sounds of Morning

Sleep has infused his brain with energy transformed into words.
 I watch his mouth moving,
 his disheveled silvery hair, his familiar far away look.
 I try to stay focused while he lectures
 on theories of black holes, the ninth planet,
 evolutionary development,
 how the brain works,
 religion, politics,
 and ultimately,
 solutions, not always pretty.
 Squinting in the pale light of early morning
 I silently review our numbers,
 years behind,
 years ahead.
 Our feet touch,
 rustle the sheets
 as he decodes
 the puzzle
 of the very earth
 I simply tread upon.

I used to wonder why he shares these early morning rambles with a woman who hasn't read a science book since 6th grade until one morning he pauses and says, Say something.
 I raise my eyebrows, ask, Why?
I like hearing your voice, he says tenderly.

Boulevard 3-5947

I am trying to reach Dad.
 This is not woowoo
 I need to talk to him
 things are tough here Unconditional love is hard to find I keep dialing his number he doesn't answer
 Oh, I wonder if it's because I am using an old clamshell phone like the one we bought him after Mom died which he never could fathom I rummage through my purse and pull out my iPhone 6 Dad's number is not in Favorites, not in Contacts But before I can add that obsolete number (ingrained in my brain since childhood) the early morning light bounces off my bedroom walls offering this fatherless aging daughter a stark lesson in endurance.
