Are Table Games Still Popular with Live Gaming Thriving?

Our Friends · Thursday, October 22nd, 2026

Slots have been having a pretty good run at online casinos. They're easy to play, there's loads of choice, and you don't need to spend half an hour learning the rules before you get going. Click a button, spin the reels and see what happens. Simple enough. But what about the old table games? Have blackjack, roulette and baccarat had their day, or is there still plenty of life left in them?

Well, they're certainly not going anywhere just yet.

Things did change when gambling moved online. People got used to doing things quickly, and slots fitted the bill rather nicely. Casino table games became less attractive to some players as the digital revolution brought shorter attention spans and a taste for games that got straight to the point. Slots took off, and before long, they were everywhere.

But not everybody wants to spend their evening spinning reels. Some people prefer a bit of interaction, a few decisions to make and games they've known for years. Just check out a top casino online, and it is obvious that traditional table games still have a place. They're sitting alongside the latest slots, and thanks to live gaming, they've got a new way to attract players.

Here's where things get interesting. Live casino games let you join a table with a real dealer, all from your phone or computer. You can watch the cards being dealt, follow the roulette wheel and chat with the dealer as the game goes along.

It's obviously not quite the same as heading out to a casino for the evening. There's no need to get dressed up, book a taxi or pay for a hotel room, though. You can play from your sofa if that's what takes your fancy.

The big difference is having an actual person running the game. There's a bit of conversation, a bit of personality, and something happening on screen that feels less like playing against a computer. For people who miss the social side of casino gaming, that's a pretty decent alternative.

Blackjack and roulette are natural fits, but baccarat and poker-style games have their own audiences too. The rules might differ, but the attraction is much the same. People know these games, and they like the way they work.

A Few New Tricks

Technology has helped live gaming along, too. Streaming is better, the pictures are sharper, and playing on a mobile doesn't feel like trying to watch a film through a keyhole anymore.

There's also more variety than you might expect. Some live games use 3D graphics and extra camera angles, while others put a different spin on familiar rules. Speed roulette and faster blackjack games, for example, keep things moving for anyone who doesn't fancy hanging around between rounds.

The Old Favourites Still Have Plenty to Offer

Slots aren't going to lose their place at online casinos anytime soon. There's too much variety, and they're easy to pick up whenever you've got a few minutes to spare.

But table games offer something different. There's the dealer, the interaction and the feeling that you're part of a game rather than simply watching reels spin.

Live gaming has given these old favourites a new lease of life. The setting might have changed, but blackjack is still blackjack, and there's still something satisfying about watching that roulette ball bounce around the wheel.

So, are table games still popular? You bet they are. They might have to share the limelight with thousands of slots these days, but they're holding their own. And with live gaming continuing to develop, there's little reason to think they'll be disappearing from our screens anytime soon.
