

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Bunkong Tuon: Three Poems

Bunkong Tuon · Wednesday, August 10th, 2016

Born a few years before the Khmer Rouge takeover of Cambodia in 1975, Bunkong Tuon remembered very little of the atrocities committed under Pol Pol rule. He left with his grandmother and extended family for refugee camps in Thailand in 1979, and grew up in Malden, Massachusetts in the 1980s. He is Associate Professor of English at Union College, in Schenectady, NY. His work has appeared in Poetry Quarterly, New York Quarterly, Paterson Literary Review, Chiron Review, The Más Tequila Review, Nerve Cowboy, Misfit, among others. His first full-length collection, Gruel, was published by NYQ Books in 2015. He is currently working on a new project tentatively titled Lessons.

The Cast

On the pier's edge
my right arm arches, I reach back and back pointing the fishing rod to Revere Beach
where we landed thirty years ago with our names and immigration numbers.
Then I let the line go past Long Beach
where I found my voice, crossing the Pacific,
flying over Viet Nam,
landing in Battambang,
my birthplace.
I reel in slowly,
counting the words
and syllables,
taking in the green fields and baby buffaloes,
the children running
to greet their father

returning home from a day of planting rice in muddy water.
 I reel until the hook catches Grandpa's coconut tree.
 With all of me I pull
 legs pushing the ground, trying to tell you how sweet that coconut juice tasted, how it entered
 my body and stays.

Five in the Morning

An empty
 Ramen bowl lies
 on the kitchen table.
 My eyelids
 are heavy with dew.
 I am trying to write about our first snow in America: cold and soft,
 about our sponsor
 who took us in his home and church
 before we told him
 we were Buddhist
 and never saw him again, about my aunt crying
 because the bus driver didn't say anything
 when those teenagers, her son's age, spat
 and told her to go home, about a cousin who asked,
 "Why do they hate us?
 What did we ever do to them?"
 about my uncle who loved his Christian boss so much he named his first child after her, about waking up one morning to find an entire refugee family sleeping in our living room because my uncle said to remember always where we had been,

 about Grandma dreaming of returning to Srok Khmer
 to be with her sister, about eating
 only white rice
 browned with soy sauce, about fishing
 with an old Coke can wrapped in nylon string, about waking up
 at five in the morning
 from the noise
 two uncles made as they carried a Styrofoam cooler
 filled with carp
 the size of my thighs flopping on top of each other my aunts and grandmother at the cutting boards gutting and cleaning the fish.

Just Wait and See

A friend said, “Strangers will go out of their way for you.”
 Another chimed in,
 “When I was pregnant
 we were at this diner.
 The owner came over with a glass of milk.
 I said, ‘We didn’t order this.’
 He smiled, ‘For baby.’” My wife had been waiting for such moments
 but they never came.
 Once a young man parked his black Toyota Tundra at the entrance of Price Chopper, with the windows down, Megadeth blasting, cigarette smoke everywhere.
 His girlfriend came out of the grocery store, leaned into the window, kissed him, showing her taught midriff.

My wife walked around them.
At a checkout line the cashier asked, "How many months along are you?"
Before she could answer a young woman behind her said, "Don't ask her that!"
The two women who could be mother and daughter
began arguing about the etiquette
of assuming a visibly pregnant woman to be pregnant.
My wife picked up
her grocery bags
and left quickly, baby kicking.

[alert type=alert-white]Please consider making a tax-deductible donation now so we can keep publishing strong creative voices.[/alert]

This entry was posted on Wednesday, August 10th, 2016 at 8:24 pm and is filed under Poetry. You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.