Chad Grant: Two Poems

Hunger

Silence, like flies

Fluttering on rotten tomatoes.

The refrigerator hums in concentration of what lies within.

It's been a while since it had anything on its mind.

But I was caught between jobs when they cut the proverbial light on.

There comes a time when one is led by the gut,

and hunger is the voice that grumbles at you like an old woman

Telling you to get up.

You feel all out of sorts, but you do,

'cause you don't want to let yourself down.

Hunger is a bitch when not fed.

Feeling Guilty After Picking a Rose

You held me as you did

Your Rosary,

As if I could save you.

As if I alone could save you

From the madness.

Perhaps it was my fault—

All of those things said,

When the words would come

As you eventually did,

Virgin.

And now nothing will remedy the Anguish.

For a while, we experimented our bodies for

Newer ways to get off.

Those elicit etcetera's which are frowned

Upon.

But you reveled in the superfluous out of spite.

But what now?

I ruminate with eyes on tomorrow, While the young carpe diem We search for a manger With folded hands And eyes towards the heavens.
