Impatient Elegy

My mother sure is taking her sweet time coming back for a visit. I thought the dead were supposed to linger a good while, pull up a chair by your sleeping form and murmur soft truths like leaves touched by the wind. But not Mom. She boarded her train early, clutching her one-way ticket, and didn't even wave out the window as it pulled away. She'll eventually write a funny postcard, I imagine, maybe send a clipping every once in a while with no note but "have you seen this?" scrawled sort of hastily in the margin. I know she'll enter my dreams someday, but it won't be on tiptoe and she won't come to lay another blanket over me or gaze in wonder at my graying face.
No, she'll be reading some book and laughing.
She'll stop short, look a bit surprised to see me, then continue reading favorite passages aloud.
She'll mix her drinks stronger than mine and if I remark on it, she will just look at me with that face, that I've-been-to-war face that she spent her whole life perfecting.

A Note on Democracy

My neighbor flies two flags, one on each side of the porch jutting out over the sidewalk.
He never brings them in at night as my soldier father always said was essential.

 Something about honor,
 something about ritual.
 The flags fly in rain or whirlwind.
 They flutter and ripple in the dark as the country does, unsupervised and unseeing.
 On holidays or working days—nothing to distinguish them anymore. I guess they're all working days, even unto the night shift, and double shifts forever. The neighbor's dog keeps barking all day long and most of the night, as though she knows nothing better.
 As if her rightful owner would come any day now and carry her away. There is no such god, and by now she seems not to believe it herself.
 Barking is what she has instead.
 It's sort of a song, a comfort that the unsupervised and unseeing must need in the dark.

Smoke at the Lake

It's sacred ground because we remember the dear ones who walked here and walk it no more. The scent of barbecue on the wind, children splashing and shrieking down at the beach, and because it's getting late one by one the old ones have risen, grimacing a little at their frozen knees and stiff backs, all heading back toward the house and beginning to turn to smoke.
