In this article, let's delve into why choosing is the better step for you and your career.

What career opportunities can you get from a Master's in Music Performance program?

When you think about the different types of music performance careers, the job profile of the professional musician will likely be top of mind. If you have a passion for performing, pursuing a career on stage could be the right path.

Here are other options you can consider with the Master's in Music Performance program:

- Professional musician: As a professional musician or a singer, you'll have the opportunity to perform in groups such as bands or orchestras. You typically play the music at bars, clubs, weddings, and other private events. To enhance your employability in the music industry, it's important to develop skills in different genres, instruments, and styles. To improve your brand, you've got to do with media interviews, social media campaigns, and photo shoots.
- Disc Jockey (DJ): In the past, DJs primarily worked for radio stations, where they were involved in playing music or giving running commentary in radio stations. However, today it has drastically changed, and a DJ refers to someone who mixes tracks and performs at events. Some DJs work at bars and clubs, weddings, private parties, concerts, music residencies etc.
- Music educator: If you're passionate about music and are not confident enough to perform on stage, then the better career option you can have is becoming a music teacher or music educator. You'll have two primary options if you want to become a music teacher. The first option is that if you want to teach music in public schools, you'll be required to become a licensed music teacher, and for private music studios, you do not need to be licensed.

- Music producer: As a music producer, you'll be closely working with the editor and the writer, and the primary role of the music producer is to ensure that bringing out music is as good as possible and reflects the vision of the piece.
- Music agent: If you're genuinely passionate about music but have no idea where you have to perform professionally or work in the recording studio, then, you must consider developing your personality, equipped with excellent communication skills, and a knack for working well with all different types of people. Having all these skills will help you become a music agent, which would be great career choice for you.
