

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

All-Female Shrew Misses the Mark

David Sheward · Wednesday, June 22nd, 2016

With its celebration of Elizabethan-era sexism, The Taming of the Shrew has always been a challenging production for modern audiences. In bringing the rebellious Katherina to heel, the chauvinistic Petruchio employs starvation, abuse, and possibly even rape, and is rewarded with an obedient spouse and riches from his father-in-law who essentially sells the contentious bride to be rid of her. Most contemporary stagings sidestep the work's essential misogyny and concentrate on the comic elements, but the current Shakespeare in the Park edition faces it head on in a radical interpretation featuring an all-female cast staged by a female director. The intentions may be honorable, but the results are mixed at best.

Janet McTeer and Cush Jumbo in The Taming of the Shrew.

Credit: Joan Marcus

Stager Phyllida Lloyd shifts the action from 16th century Italy to a weird American circus where a beauty contest is taking place. The unseen emcee sounds suspiciously like a certain presidential candidate who ran the Miss USA pageant. The ironic concept of male objectification and oppression being portrayed by cross-dressing women is intriguing but feels imposed on the text as the beauty pageant scenes are tacked onto the rough-and-tumble courtship between the contentious leads. In another awkward sequence, Judy Gold who plays Gremio, one of the unsuccessful suitors of Katherina's sweeter sister Bianca, drops her Shakespearean character and launches into a contemporary stand-up routine decrying the advancement of women and longs for the good old days when tired businessmen would come home from work to a submissive wife and dinner on the table. Gold, a veteran comic, delivers the monologue with expert timing and gets her laughs, but it's as if she and director Lloyd were hitting us over the head with a feminist cudgel. "See look how terrible these sexist pigs are," they seem to be saying.

Despite the directorial overkill, Lloyd knows how to keep a show moving, with numerous cuts and no intermission, this is a rapid Shrew at only two breathless hours. Plus, there are performances to cheer. Janet McTeer is irresistibly infectious as a macho Petruchio, mocking the masculine posture by exaggerating his swagger but she does not make him a cardboard bully. Cush Jumbo's Kate is spirited and fiery, but she fails to make sense of the heroine's final conversion to domesticity or the frantic denouement imposed by Lloyd (no spoilers but the director chooses to invert Shakespeare's conclusion and tie in the beauty pageant theme which had been abandoned much earlier in the evening.)

Donna Lynne Champlin is a surprisingly vivid Hortensio and Gayle Rankin delivers a coquettishly ditzzy Bianca. Mark Thompson's appropriately garish sets and costumes reflect the carnival atmosphere. I confess I did love Petruchio's massive RV smashing onto the Delacorte stage and steamrolling everything in its path. Too bad Lloyd did the same thing to the play.

Curtis Wiley, Ato Blankson-Wood, and Jahi Kearsse in The Total Bent.

Credit: Joan Marcus

Meanwhile, downtown, the Public Theatre presents another uneven production. Like Shrew, The Total Bent, the new rock musical from Stew and Heidi Rodewald of Passing Strange fame, starts out with a potentially strong premise. TV gospel singer-preacher Joe Roy vies with his gay son Marty, a talented songwriter-performer, over race and identity. As the Civil Rights movement rages, Marty seeks his own destiny away from his recreant dad, eventually becoming a rock star. Vondie Curtis-Hall and Ato Blankson-Wood give thrilling vocal and dramatic limning of the combatants and the score is sizzling. But the plot becomes repetitious and feels drawn out at less than two hours.

Himself and Nora, another Off-Broadway musical playing in the Greenwich Village area, is professional but shallow. This portrait of literary giant James Joyce and his strong-willed romantic partner Nora Barnacle—they lived together for 27 years and had two children before marrying—is a like a musical Wikipedia entry. All the facts are there, but author-composer Jonathan Brielle doesn't probe very deeply into the creator of the greatest works of the 20th century or his primary relationship. The five-member cast is proficient and lively and director Michael Bush paces the proceedings smartly enough, but Brielle's choices are conventional. Hardly fitting for the most unconventional of authors. While Shrew goes too far, the two Off-Broadway musicals don't go far enough.

The Taming of the Shrew: June 13—26. Shakespeare in the Park at the Delacorte Theatre, Central Park West at W. 81st St., NYC. Tue—Sun, 8 pm. Running time: two hours with no intermission. Free. (212) 967-7555. www.publictheater.org

The Total Bent: May 25–June 26. Public Theater, 425 Lafayette St., NYC. Tue—Sun, 7pm, Sat & Sun, 1 pm. Running time: 1 hour and 50 minutes with no intermission. $65. (212) 967-7555. www.publictheater.org.

Himself and Nora: Opened June 6 for an open run. Minetta Lane Theatre, 18 Minetta Lane, NYC. Tue, 7pm, Wed—Sat, 8 pm, Wed and Sat, 2pm, Sun, 3 pm. Running time: two hours including intermission. $89—$125. (800) 745-3000. www.ticketmaster.com.

This review previously appeared on ArtsinNY.com and Theaterlife.com.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, June 22nd, 2016 at 10:23 am and is filed under Theatre, Music. You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.