Frances Klein: Three Poems

Frances Klein · Wednesday, December 13th, 2023

Schoenbar Road, Midwinter

Freezing rain, and branches rebelling against sky to bow earthward, wind spread like a sheet on a new-made bed.

Love drove us out, sled-laden: love of speed, of icicles snapped from gutters, their iron tint filming our tongues, love of our father and his love of an empty kitchen.

Hill where margin trades places with center—top and bottom both safe as stationary, between stretches treacherous with rise, lilt, cadence of chance and reflex.

Street sleeping dormant under winter, save places where it roused and kicked covers just enough, flint-thin asphalt bones exposed.

Dangling from his coattails, stepping in snow where his boots have been, feet too small to fill prints, head swiveling to breathe in puffs of stories spilling out. We posed on the crest as if framed, then fell to earth, vessels off the edge of the world, and here is where memory goes hazy, mixed with fable:

you say the street roused long enough to reach out one long, bony finger. You say I, neither lucky nor careful, chin-kissed curb, added red confetti to falling flakes, ended the outing. I say smooth skin without scar, I say green sled over blue-white snow all day into evening, and again, again, again.

Prayer for the Dudes who Catcalled Me in Front of my Toddler

after Lucille Clifton

I pray you reach your destination safely, but upon arriving realize that you have forgotten all the balloons for the douchebag parade.

I pray the other douchebags never forgive you.

I pray you get your heart broken by a mediocre white girl while your favorite song is playing.
The joy the notes once conjured dissipates like her cucumber melon body mist.

I pray that the people with whom you are most open and vulnerable describe you as a friend of a friend.

I pray your every drive-thru order comes out just wrong enough to rankle—nine nuggets in the box, mild wings instead of spicy.

I pray unending taint-itch through all of your days.

I pray doctors who care for you as lovingly and attentively as they do women in pain.

I pray rain, and the window of your car cracked just enough.

I pray two dollars in your account and two weeks until payday.

I pray crunch of dry ramen when the power company cuts the cord.

I pray your loved ones are alive, healthy, and disappointed in what you have made of yourself.

I pray all the porn videos you watch glitch right before the money shot.

I pray for you fear, hot and coppery.

I pray every time you step on an elevator you feel the bottom fall out from your stomach, that same startled alarm I saw in my son's eyes when he heard the doppler keen of your scream going by.

Embarcadero, 2013

Harbor seals don't care about your photograph.

They don't care about your pose, the angle.

They don't care that you are so in love

you pull on a sundress
over your sunburn,

put on the cute sandals with soles like paper, and walk out onto the pier to stand with him in a way that radiates newness, two people who have not yet learned how to lace their fingers together without tangling thumbs.

All the harbor seals want is to lounge in the sun unencumbered, to ignore the pretzels thrown by tourists, to roll off the pier, tuck into the covers of the ocean bed under unlined blue skies.
