Richard Jones: "I Call My Mother Once a Week"

Richard Jones · Thursday, June 20th, 2013

Richard Jones is the director of the Creative Writing Program at DePaul University, as well as the author of five books of poetry. The most recent is The Blessing, published by Copper Canyon Press.

I Call My Mother Once a Week

My mother lives in a land of disaster and tragedy.
Yesterday on the phone she said, *Look, a small white plane just crashed
in the yard.* Good thing
it didn't land on the house
I said, not knowing what to say.
It was like the time she'd said
The house next door burned to the ground, and I'd said,
You're kidding, and she said,
It was an inferno, then asked,
because I know about words,
if she had used the right one.
I said inferno was exactly right,
and she added that it was night,
pitch-black, and the young family of four had died in the fire.
They couldn't be saved? I said.
They couldn't be found, she said,
and in the silence on the phone
we could almost hear the flames.
To change the subject, I inquired about her crazy friend, Nancy.
Nancy was always up to something.
Arrested for murder, my mother said.
What? I said. She hired a hit man *to kill the wife of the man she wants to marry. Tragedy is, the man didn't even really know Nancy.

Of course there's nothing to say in response to a story like that,
so I just said, Sounds like true love,
and my mother said, It does, doesn't it?*

Cultural Weekly is proud to premiere this poem by Richard Jones.
