Jennifer Bradpiece: Three Poems

One Through Ten

Doctor,

Your question,
my chronic pain.
My answer,
at your request, 1-10.

But first, tell me
1-10: how much you love each of your children?

1-10: how much you would miss your sibling versus your spouse?

1-10: how you would order your senses?
Lose the wild raspberry and amber spray of sunset, versus the scent of your newborn's skin?

1-10: where your passions fall?
Your successes, your failures, your dreams?

I am not sure, at all, Doctor, you understand the weight 1-10 implicates—the hidden balances, agendas, the compensatory scales.

If I were to tell you that the way down is deep,
the sinking long,
and you won't make the next narrow pass without two oars,
Doctor, which one would you choose?

The Urge to Make Things Ugly

Slices shards of amber glass through fleshy toes in sparkling sand Pries the legs off fuzzy green caterpillars Scrapes a chiffon scarf down the peeling paint of an alley wall Drives rusty nails into polished rosewood Loosens salt caps on immaculately set tables Scuffs tarry streaks across a freshly mopped floor Clamps teeth tightly around tin foil Knows you know exactly how it feels Shatters the crystal vase of roses against a vanity mirror Bites a manicured cuticle until the hangnail bleeds Smears lipstick the color of clotted blood Claws silk stockings over long pale thighs Jams a new stiletto heel against the concrete floor Spills red wine across white linens Teeters over to the three-legged desk Perches on an empty corner Never gets invited back

Thirteenth Floor

I sweep my hand down across the string section of telephone wires.
 A few bird notes fly out as a dusk tone settles
 the city beneath me.
 Lit and drunk on a roof top of a twelve-story building that is not my own,
 the slice of city
 below is an orchestra pit I might fall into.
 Imagine that sound — each building's face an industrial grand piano, tilted sideways — the alternating dark and florescent windows are keys I might slide across, skin staccato against their cold metal frames. I'm so high, and high up, leaning over the brick edge, I could melt into the street music.
 Toy horn section of tiny cars, cymbal crash of construction metal, an oboe pitch of moon clears its throat through the blushing saxophone sky.

The clouds, a purple treble, puffed out copper edges.
Twilight deepens—a baritone drone bagpipe flannel falling in measured tartan tones.
I long to scale the octaves, so high but pulled to float low, conduct this urban symphony in flight, tuning fork bones vibrate as the bell of my beer bottle rings against the roof's rim.
I stretch my torso over the edge of the pit, want to lose all my selves, break the fourth wall, open my lips to the mouthpiece, throat hungry for reed, and stroke my spine across the gathering violin-bowed strain of night.
If my legs slide over
I could hold the wood, strum fingers against the nylon gut between staccato stars, tend the glass harp, angel organ, dive into this seraphim sea through the crescendo nearly over the edge.
