

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Judy Brackett: Three Poems

Judy Brackett · Wednesday, October 25th, 2017

Judy Brackett lives and writes in a small town in California's northern Sierra Nevada foothills. Her poem "As If There Were No Steel" took second place in Cultural Weekly's 2014 Jack Grapes Poetry Contest. Her stories and poems have appeared or are forthcoming in Epoch, The Maine Review, Catamaran, burntdistrict, Commonweal, The Midwest Quarterly, West Marin Review, Miramar, Subtropics, Crab Orchard Review, and elsewhere.

*****

Defining Ourselves

In a picture-book Webster's, under "unbelievable" or "harebrained idea," you might find circus elephants balancing on tiny stools, their almond-small wet eyes empty,
 de-clawed bears riding tricycles, monkeys banging on tambourines, also horses clattering up dozens of stairs to a wobbly platform and diving into a not-so-deep pool, the relentless sun an aloof observer.

Let's put a girl in a red spangly bathing suit on the horse and watch them dive, together. And if one of them lands wrong, breaks a leg or ruins her eyes, let's train a new horse and praise the gutsy girl for coming back for more.
 Let's give them names like Lizzy and Lottie, or Red Lips and Sonora. Let's watch the girl on the platform casually paint her own lips, turn a slow turn, sketch a blind wave, and climb onto the horse, clutching his mane in her fists.

Let us admire the divers' beauty, their grace.
 Let us feel the splash that shames and defines us all.

***

Flight Plan

Bone blades jut where her wings were once affixed. Rolling her shoulders back and down, she can feel the pulse, the strength of them, can almost remember flying.

Riding the bike down the steep and winding pot-holed lane—airborne, almost. Swinging on the old saddle hanging from the rafters in the hayloft, hay bales stacked against the walls, mice nests, bird nests, barn cats prowling, the owl tucked into his high-up corner, haydust motes fogging the air, she sneezing and swinging—no horse, just girl and saddle, the barn window thrown open to the green world, she wondering if she can swing high enough, fast enough, far enough, swim/fly out the window and dive into the pond or the house-high haystack.

No, not the haystack—needles, errant pitchforks.

***

Tomorrow

This flat wide-open place is airless, but she doesn't know that yet. She dreams, walks to the library, checks out her-five-books-per-day ration, sits under a poplar on the way home and reads a couple, reads the rest that night, treks back to the library tomorrow, thinking that her bare feet are carving ruts in the earth. Running to the edge of town she wonders at the line at the curb of the world where green or brown or white meets blue (the beginning or the end?).
The orderly fields—

in summer blindingly green and smelling of dirt and sunrays,
in winter
crop-stubbed or snow buried—are alluring and terrifying, pulling her to their plainness, their silences.
She writes songs and sings them to herself, to the books, to the fields, to the sky.
She dreams. She waits for something.
She leaves.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, October 25th, 2017 at 5:59 pm and is filed under Poetry.
You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can skip to the end and leave a response. Pinging is currently not allowed.