Afternoon Tea Daydreams

In the hilly pasture, my twin sister and I sit on dense Irish damask (white with swirls pearly as oyster shells) Granny handed down along with her farm, shamrock china, and the art of reading tea leaves. Deidre hands me a cup of Merlin's Magic Elixir of Life ordered from Galway, mélange of lemon myrtle, marigold petals, grapes, rosehip peels.

She overflows her cup from the pewter kettle, in a reverie of last summer's lover.

We've spread homegrown cucumbers with our goats' cheese seasoned by rosemary and thyme. Kaylie joins us, mouth sunk in the cream crock we filled for her, eyes drowsy—milk drunk we call it—daydreams of suckling her nanny's teat only a year ago.

The feral smell of her fur mixes with whiffs of seaweed shampoo from our wind-frizzed auburn hair. The sun's heat on my back, the rhythmic lap of tongue, and the sigh of dry ryegrass tilts me into a nap.

Clasped in a Moment of Fracture

Her spaniel Vincent, returned from an ocean plunge, releases a snatched mackerel into the woman's open palm. She wants no part of what her delicate fingers support—this limp, opal-scaled body, its rheumy eyes gone dark. Her eyes distant, she chafes the past and future. Vincent's wise gaze fixes on a sandpiper hopping ahead. The fur on his ears, the tawny amber of honey, and her plush chestnut hair blow askew in high winds. He's collarless; she wears a white ruffle around her neck that echoes a silver choker. Saltwater droplets from the fish and dog's mouth mirror the crystal rosary beads she fingered last night to find an answer. A blustery sky and waves arched in ecstasy frame her face, pearly as moonlight.

Winter Solstice

The first snowstorm melted except for a patch by the barn where the family of five crows swooped from their roost after I threw dry kibble our Corgi refused to eat. Their caws and wings percuss air.

I swish through fields, flatten russet crests of ryegrass, gather branches. Fog entwines birch trunks, ghosts the barn, soot-black with age. Wind and cold chap my cheeks and lips. Soon as dark descends, my love returns. We'll howl around flames, revel in heat, color, crackle, spark, launch our hibernation.
