Karla Huston: Three Poems

A Woman Lighting a Cigarette

after Paul Hortovsky

She does it with the filter tip held between the first knuckles of her first two fingers, bringing it slowly to her mouth, pads to lips, fire to tip.
She changes to her other hand to smoke it, tap it like a wand. She holds her cigarette like a teacup.

A man lighting a cigarette holds it in the vee of those same fingers where he cups it for the first inhale.
It'll stay there for the duration or he'll move it up a bit but not as far as the woman. A man holds his cigarette like a fist.

What a Poem Needs

A poem needs a velocity of verbs, a keening of nouns.
A poem needs a reader to breathe it, to exhale the secret of the dark, of light

A poem needs a river, needs streams of smooth stones, needs a confession of snowflakes, needs a wisdom of owls sheltered in a cedar

A poem needs trees, empty of leaves, winds—sharp north where doves hang like gray ghosts, one red cardinal pinned to a branch

I Hold My Pen like Taylor Swift between my middle and index finger which, I might add, is an acceptable alternative pen hold. I also use fountain pens. I learned cursive in fourth grade where we were never allowed to fill our pens on our desks, even though there was a bottle slot.

No teacher wanted to clean India Ink off the floor. Taylor Swift writes love songs to new and old lovers.
I write poetry the best I can though my poor poems won't appear on the latest Billboard 100 chart.
Taylor Swift has had many lovers.
I had one, but I have many pens, and almost as many bottles of ink.
Taylor Swift wears red lipstick with cat's-eye liner. I can't tell you the name of any of her hit songs.
It's a safe bet she's read none of my poems.
