Korengal Exposes the Heresy of War

Adam Leipzig · Wednesday, May 28th, 2014

What does war feel like from the inside?

“The experience of soldiers doesn’t vary that much, whether they are in a ‘good war’ or a ‘bad war,’” says director and author Sebastian Junger, whose newest film, Korengal, begins a nationwide roll-out this weekend. “It’s easy to politicize war,” he continues, “and war is a terrible thing and should absolutely be argued about. For soldiers, though, it is such an intense experience that when they come home, they miss it and want to go back. That is a little heresy.”

Korengal aims to show, without judgement, what soldiers miss about war. It is the obverse of Junger’s previous film, the Oscar-nominated Restrepo. Restrepo thrust audiences into the experience of combat; it had no musical score or narration because that doesn’t happen in real life. Korengal is different. “Combat is morally and psychologically damaging, but it is also invigorating,” explains Junger. “Korengal tries to sort out that confusing territory for soldiers and for civilians.”

Both films were shot by Junger and director and photojournalist Tim Hetherington in Afghanistan in 2007-2008. Hetherington was killed in 2011 while covering the Libyan civil war. Junger completed Korengal on his own, and went to Kickstarter to raise more than $100,000 to distribute the film himself.

“When you distribute your movie yourself, you don’t have to answer to anybody and no one can disappoint you,” says Junger. “But it is terrifying. In the long run, though, it pays off.”

Restrepo is among the greatest war documentaries ever made. With its release this weekend, Korengal completes the soldiers’ story, exposing how the seemingly external conflict of war burrows inside us, to become the conflict of our hearts and minds.
