

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Leslie Anne Mcilroy: Four Poems

Leslie Anne Mcilroy · Wednesday, April 16th, 2014

Leslie Anne Mcilroy won the 2001 Word Press Poetry Prize for her full-length collection Rare Space and the 1997 Slipstream Poetry Chapbook Prize for her chapbook Gravel. She also took first place in the 1997 Chicago Literary Awards Competition judged by Gerald Stern. Her second full-length book, Liquid Like This, was published by Word Press in 2008. Leslie's work appears in numerous publications including Connotation Press, Dogwood, Jubilat, The Mississippi Review, New Ohio Review, Nimrod International Journal of Prose & Poetry, PANK and Pearl.

How to Change a Flat

The weather left me raw—freezing sleet and leaning wind icing my enthusiasm for waving someone down.
Someone with a CB or a cell phone, a jack and solid workboots; someone with a hard on to do something good,
to get on his knees
and apply his weight till the lug nuts give and let go the grip.

I could've faced the storm, the winter bearing down like an avalanche of wet mean dreams; stood out there with my arms spread wide, my head bowed against the gusts, or at least I could've read the manual, found a flare, jammed a white rag in the door. But I'm thinking it's got to let up soon and what's the worst that can happen?

It's only 7:00 and I can catch the news; I can flash my lights from inside where it's warm, where just now a shameless version of Sweet Jane begins to play, my hand drifting in response—the slight resistance of the tangled skirt peeled beneath my coat, the heel of my palm pressed flat against my stomach, the first touch of fingers brushing bare thighs warm and wet under the frosted highway lights. And I have half a tank of gas—enough to write a letter, enough to imagine telling you about sex alone in the front seat, headlights passing smoothly across the windshield, the frigid breath of January melting from the inside out. How when the flurry's spent, mechanics mean so little and the drive

is only the half of it.

250 Rebel

In the dream I wanted badly for my father to fix my motorcycle.
I kept handing him wrenches, worried I would forget/have forgotten how the gears work.

I would have forgiven him everything to get it started, to feel the spread of the leather between my legs, to be able to leave like that, no direction except away, except he was elusive the way fathers are, dreams. He shook his head and was frail. I knew he was sick because he always has/had been.

I knew he could fix it. I knew he wouldn't.

Double Kiss

What I know about pool is nothing, but I know hip and swagger and something about angle and the way when you kiss one person and they kiss another, it falls hard in the pocket and there is a score to total, to settle, to wash down with another shot. Or maybe it's more like scratch, that white ball going straight in the hole, reminding me of boys and sticks, balls tucked tight, ready to break — that triangle, the other — did you really think you could fuck me like this, with your game, your blue-tip poetry, your handicap?
 I want nothing more than to walk away from this table, the hat-wearing and knuckle-cracking, dirty smoke and Pabst pounders, to slip out under the Pittsburgh neon, eat eggs with toast and RedHot.
 Somebody's winning everywhere, and losing, somebody's got a cue stick up someone's ass, somebody is learning grace at a table of old-school, where the winner buys and the girls don't play, and if they do, they forfeit, go all chalk and luck.

Heart Time

For days now, I've been hearing my heart beat.
 In my dreams, in the city wind, on the radio.

I've been counting up and down in the back of my brain, adding and subtracting like an insistent abacus, the balls clicking their restless, wooden bodies together through the night and into the morning, stirring coffee six times round, then seven, then eight.

It's come to me that I can measure beauty this way, by counting my presence in this final world.

I can calculate how much it matters to appreciate the sun, to walk home with a barrette from my daughter's hair in my pocket, reminding me of time, soft skin, the first kiss and its pulse; the throb of thunder timed exactly before the lightning, the flash.

And with each beat, I draw further away from myself and into the lovely dance of dying, knowing only that when it stops, I will hear nothing but your voice, telling me the silence is full, the water, quiet.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, April 16th, 2014 at 1:37 pm and is filed under Poetry.
You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.