Lilly Nelson: Three Poems

Winter

Exhaustion burns blue circles under my eyes craves the blood seeping into my mouth from my broken lip I've been chewing on for two hours like a pack of big league chew bubble gum my nails claw into my forearm's flesh to distract from the iron that coats the back of my swollen throat

I'm stranded on the last train to midnight sulking in the caboose, musing sips of hot chocolate, bones slumped against the iron window frame staring at the man in the side aisle across from me enveloped in the blue corduroy jacket as he sews amber letters into the back of his leather notebook

He is planning my funeral in December scattered with needles, under the pine trees my empty casket
hinges sealed with black ice like a kiss from death, white snow mixes with the smoke colored ashes slipping between his worn fingers
He chose death before me, but I'm too exhausted to care

Smoke Break

Permission lit the cigarette sleeping between my lips

Cockroaches crawl over my raised skin as nicotine sends shocks to my receptors.

My thoughts crave numbness.

I count the ten seconds till my next hit,

but it feels like infinity.

Smoke architects
my conviction as addiction takes me further away into space.

I have a theory that chocolate takes the pain away from loss if you eat enough of it.

I ground the cigarette under my boot,
and sulk to the candy aisle.

They wanted to prescribe xanax.

I pop packs of M&Ms.

Pleurer á Paris

I thought love was supposed to stay remnant like the gerber daisies in my mother's garden, yet my trust is waning like the snapping of my twig-like wrist under my own body weight The migraines and gravity force my slothing body towards the cold tile like wine glasses shattering Jealousy drives the virus coagulating the blood in my veins

In November, I wanted to be your illicit love affair
What if you tasted like strawberries in an autumn breeze?
Or your embrace- the warmth of sex after a movie
Your eyes, pools of copper consumed my consciousness like a puppet ripped from its strings
Your nails digging into my waist, pulled me towards the riverbed I would have drowned in the Seine if you told me to

But I can't be your midnight addiction.
Not when your blood is my amber and my tears are the sweat you're wiping away from your body
You left me with water colored eyes beneath the embers of the Notre Dame.
River flames drowning the scent of the insults you whispered against my neck Degrading my worth till I hit the wall begging, pleading "don't stop" Shoulders pressed against the walnut dorm frame, yellow blemishes engraved into my chest
You should have stopped the memories from slipping away, but my memory is decay past 1974

I still stay up all night grasping for your name
