Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Living & Dying In the Same Room

Thommy Ahneesan · Wednesday, May 19th, 2021

I've been talking to spoons as if they were babies for years now. Apologizing to body parts for harming them, promising to never do it again. I put my hand over my liver and say, "Sorry honey, I did it again." Full conversations with a showerhead-god, rubbing my feisty hands together when things are going okay, I say, "So what'll we do now boys?!" talking to furniture. What can I rearrange? What kind of soup can I summon from the netherworld, only to try tiny sips of it, alone. The rest I throw away, eventually. Into several plastic bags to shut it up, sorrowful, sour, spiritless sludge. So when I read OBIT by Victoria Chang, it was the first time I've seen real life given to anything and everything—only to kill them all off, one by one. She kills herself many times, along with her mother, in various stages of deaths, Voice Mail, Language, Logic, Ambition, a Chair and the Future itself.

ghost in sheet by artist Brandon Vosika.

OBIT is like a Disney movie from hell. Better than hell. A bardo—a liminal space between the living and the dead that cohabitate, mingle and slip in and out one another's vacuous hallways. Everything is alive and dying simultaneously; a broom might be dancing while a chair collapses. Although one might read it as "magical realism," it's the most realistic illustration of actual life I've ever witnessed on the page. We truly are constantly losing but we're not lit up with awareness like Chang.

We like to think we're the only living thing in an empty apartment. But as I type this now, my food is dying. Some of my food was a living animal and has been dead much longer than I would like to accept. The chicken doesn't even have a ghost anymore; the ghost has done flown. Good for you, chicken-ghost. The sausage disgusts me so I dispose of it without a proper burial. Everything goes flying. The flowers the children gave me from my teaching job are all dead. That job is dead. They will all forget me. The daisies and other flowers I won't pretend to name hang their heads in gentle repose, frozen shadows of a flower from the edge of Vesuvius. Plastic ivy mimics life and it will live far longer than any of us will. I am dying. Decaying. Slipping little-by-little through a window that no one will ever see when it is finally open enough to carry me out. I will have to weigh much less, so perhaps I will actually one day, be an "old lady" (although no one would see that one comin').

Accidental jar of sauce with the name Victoria positioned by an actual ghost.

Chang breaks up her fantasia of dancing objects and dying parents with Japanese traditional poems called tankas. I think it's her way of inserting hope. Each tanka (something akin to a Haiku, different syllables/scheme) is about her children. Children are off limits in this world she has created (or perhaps the world she has allowed herself to see, to swallow whole). They are never spoken of outside of the tanka segments. Even with her courage and cut-throat ability to bare witness to all these deaths, she cannot, will not include them. But she does seem to warn them, worry for them:

I tell my children that they can wake anything, that they are not yet dying. But what do I know? I know that a mother dies." (26)

*

I tell my children that sometimes I too can hope, that something nothing moves but my love for someone and the light from the dead star. (19)

*

When a mother dies, a house becomes a forest. My children, children, know that I am in the trees. True love means you won't find me.

*

My children, children, remember to let me go, delete my number, save the number of the trees. Remember, the lemons speak.

The book is entirely filled with obituaries aside from these more direct messages to her kids. In her final obituary, Chang writes, "The dead hold the other half of our ticket. The/dead are an image of wind. And when/they comb their hair, our trees rustle" (104).

tood the cruelty of It would be the itched places with w because suffering hape and happens the I-405 freeway. e Motor City, it is died on a freeway. mother called about s heart attack, she an indented life, a nat didn't dip. This her first death. All s had creases exne. It didn't matter other was wrong (it ke) but that Victoria d to ask whether d drive to see the . When her mother Victoria Chang had of not wanting to. heard that feeling. ne did not die but words did. At the ctoria Chang cried father no longer e. This was before stood the cruelty of e. It would be the he cried in front of ritched places with w because suffering hape and happens

Victoria.

Victoria.

owingly on June 24, the I-405 freeway. e Motor City, it is died on a freeway. mother called about s heart attack, she an indented life, a nat didn't dip. This ner first death. All s had creases exne. It didn't matter other was wrong (it ke) but that Victoria to ask whether d drive to see the When her mother ctoria Chang had

CHANG-Victoria.

Died unknowingly on June 24, 2009 on the I-405 freeway. Born in the Motor City, it is fitting she died on a freeway. When her mother called about her father's heart attack, she was living an indented life, a swallow that didn't dip. This was not her first death. All her deaths had creases except this one. It didn't matter that her mother was wrong (it was a stroke) but that Victoria Chang had to ask whether she should drive to see the

CHANG-Victoria.

Died unknowingly on June 24, 2009 on the I-405 freeway. Born in the Motor City, it is fitting she died on a freeway. When her mother called about her father's heart attack, she was living an indented life, a swallow that didn't dip. This was not her first death. All her deaths had creases except this one. It didn't matter that her mother was wrong (it was a stroke) but that Victoria Chang had to ask whether she should drive to see the frontal lobe. When her mother said yes, Victoria Chang had the feeling of not wanting to. Someone heard that feeling. Because he did not die but all of his words did. At the hospital, Victoria Chang cried when her father no longer made sense. This was before she understood the cruelty of his disease. It would be the cept this one. It didn't matter that her mother was wrong (it was a stroke) but that Victoria Chang had to ask whether she should drive to see the frontal lobe. When her mother said yes, Victoria Chang had the feeling of not wanting to. Someone heard that feeling. Because he did not die but all of his words did. At the hospital, Victoria Chang cried when her father no longer made sense. This was before she understood the cruelty of his disease. It would be the last time she cried in front of it. She switched places with her shadow because suffering changes shape and happens POEMS mether Someone heard that feeling Because he did not die but all of his words did. At the hospital, Victoria Chang cried when her father no longer made sense. This was before she understood the cruelty of his disease. It would be the last time she cried in front of it. She switched places with her shadow because suffering changes shape and happens secretly.

CHANG-Victoria. Died unknowingly on June 24, 2009 on the I-405 freeway.

last time she cried in front of it. She switched places with her shadow because suffering changes shape and happens secretly.

CHANG-Victoria

Died unknowingly on June 24, 2009 on the I-405 freeway. Born in the Motor City, it is fitting she died on a freeway. When her mother called about her father's heart attack, she was living an indented life, a All > wrong (it Chang had vanting to,

CHANG-Victoria.

Died unknowingly on June 24 2009 on the I-405 freeway Born in the Motor City, it is her father's heart attack, she was living an indented life, swallow that didn't dip. This was not her first death. A her deaths had croases except this one, it didn't matter was a stroke) but that said yes, Victoria Chang the feeling of not wantir her father's he was living an swallow that o was not her her deaths ha cept this one. that her mothe was a stroke) b Chang had to she should dr frontal lobe. W said yes, Victo Because he d all of his word hospital, Victor when her fat made sense. T she understoor his disease. It last time she o it. She switch her shadow be changes shape

CHANG-Vict fitting she died

OBIT by Victoria Chang

My grandmother used to say, with a little lament but also a bit of laughter at how stupid she thought everyone else was for not knowing this simple truth: "If only they could see that everything is a CIRCLE and NOT A FUCKING LINE for ONCE IN THEIR GODDAMN LIVES they would KNOW that everything is really okay."

That loss is really only an exchange for some other form of giving, recycled breath, that death is a tradeoff so that something else may live, or that we may live—another way.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, May 19th, 2021 at 9:07 am and is filed under Poetry, Reviews You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments (RSS) feed. You can skip to the end and leave a response. Pinging is currently not allowed.