

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Luke Johnson: Three Poems

Luke J. Johnson · Wednesday, October 30th, 2019

Bee Fennel

I trapped bees in boxes & carried them to the neighbor's blind son.

Set them loose. Praised their frantic undulations, their search for someone to serve,

then left him, bitten, tongue partly swollen, stomach distended & scabbed. Edit: I did not simply set them free in the blind boy's hair. I wooed them with candy & blew smoke through a hole in the box until they dropped dizzy.

Plucked their stingers. Drowned the queen & smiled as her wings folded into soda pop.

Promised the boy a taste of fennel, hot joy thrumming his throat. He opened. Teeth clean. Teeth like washed windows. Tasted my kiss. Unraveled my tongue inside his.

(Originally published in Porter Gulch Review)

*

Rats & Manna

This poem has a house on a slipped foundation and a woman beneath the porch with a wrench trying to tie down the posts. She's heavy-set with small hands and bites her lips until they bleed.

Above her footsteps thud and dust swarms. She admires the way the refraction of light comes close and whorls when her hand moves through it.

Remembers her father preaching and pacing the aisles between pews while her silent mother flipped a black bible and wrote notes, gin on her breath. These days all it takes is a gentle gale to shake the house.

If you're standing by the stove frying tilapia and a storm congeals

and what follows that storm are silk howls wrapped with rain, you'll feel your feet wobble

as the structure cracks like ship boughs, shifts for balance. This is a poem more than a house. A poem about a woman who fixes three plates for supper, who waits patiently for the back door to hook and close and the house to erupt with laughter so loud the wood shutters slap, metal sconces shake.

But there are no footsteps here, no voices in the clearing, no lover's hand moving the hair from her face when she fights fever or builds a fence or ties down the house so, the earth won't swallow her.

This is a poem about prayer, about the loss of prayer, about rats who nest inside walls and leave shit lined from room to room like manna. About two plates left like offerings, for a lover and son she carried six months into light.

(Originally published in American Journal of Poetry)

*

---

:boys

– to Smitty, Slick Nic, Mortimer and Dave

In a barn
choked by rusty tools and ragweed

we stood
in a riotous circle

watching fetal mice fill their fresh lungs with air when Smitty

behind a tribal smile

pulled a blade
from his back pocket

and began to slice one down the abdomen with ball point precision each of us stone-silent and cold

as Smitty unsnapped
the sternum
    like a bloody brassiere then moved toward the heart

    a porous drum
    swelling in his fingers.

(Originally published in the Asheville Poetry Review)

Author photo by Clara Johnson

This entry was posted on Wednesday, October 30th, 2019 at 2:43 pm and is filed under Poetry. You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can skip to the end and leave a response. Pinging is currently not allowed.

