Luminous Holbein Portraits Shine in Getty Show

Stephen West · Thursday, December 9th, 2021

Hans Holbein the Younger, one of the greatest artists of the Northern Renaissance, is being celebrated in a beautiful exhibition now on view at the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles.

Amazingly, it's the first major retrospective of the German master's work ever mounted in the United States and is co-organized with the Morgan Library & Museum in New York, where the show opens in February 2022. It features more than 50 works, mostly portrait paintings and drawings, but also designs for metalwork such as badges and medals and a handful of related works by other artists from the period.

Holbein (1497/98-1543) was born in Augsburg, Germany, the son of a successful painter. He moved to Basel, Switzerland, as a young man and began building an artistic career as the Protestant Reformation swept over Northern Europe.

His 1519 portrait of Bonifacius Amerbach (top image), one of the earliest in the exhibition, already displays many of his signature features: the uncanny realism; the luminous, polished colors; the intensely serious expression of the subject, a professor of law at the University of Basel; the mostly black clothing; the typographical description of the subject, in this case in Latin, on a framed sign hung from a tree branch. Though the portrait is only about 12 by 11 inches, it powerfully conveys the idea that this is an important person.

Holbein first achieved fame with a series of paintings of Erasmus of Rotterdam, the humanist scholar and author of In Praise of Folly. And when Holbein decided to move to London in 1526, Erasmus recommended him to Sir Thomas More, an influential figure in the court of Henry VIII. This led to a stream of portraits of the members of the court, including an iconic picture of King Henry himself, as well as commissions to paint members of the English gentry and other prominent figures.

Hans Holbein the Younger, A Lady With a Squirrel and a Starling (Anne Lovell?), about 1526-28, oil on panel, The National Gallery, London. Bought with contributions from the National Heritage Memorial Fund and the Art Fund and Mr. J. Paul Getty Jr. (through the American Friends of the National Gallery, London), 1992, © The National Gallery, London.

One such portrait of an aristocrat is A Lady With a Squirrel and a Starling (Anne Lovell?) of 1526-28. The painting, which dates to Holbein's early years in England, may depict the wife of Sir Richard Lovell of Norfolk and celebrate the birth of an heir. In any case, the young woman in black, wearing a white hat and shawl over her shoulders, presents a memorable image. The starling behind her right shoulder seems to be whispering into her ear as she looks to the side in a three-quarters pose. Incongruously, she also holds a chained pet squirrel in her lap. (The squirrel, an element in the Lovell family crest, was added to the portrait after it was virtually complete.) The meaning of it all is far from clear, but the work clearly conveys the serious, almost sad personality of the woman.

Holbein returned to Basel in 1528 and then back in London for a second time in 1532, where he became part of the circle around Anne Boleyn, King Henry's second wife. He also completed a fine series of portraits of German merchants from the Hanseatic League who were living in the Steelyard area of London. (The exhibition includes four portraits of the stylish young men.)

Hans Holbein the Younger, Thomas Cromwell, 1532-33, oil on panel, The Frick Collection, New York, Henry Clay Frick Bequest.
