1. Emily in Paris

Many would describe Emily in Paris as that go-to comfort show that helps them step into a light, easy world of entertainment, Paris aesthetic, and fashion. While this holds a lot of ground, there is so much more to the TV series than that. Emily in Paris is a TV show set in Paris that features a young marketing executive (Emily) who moves to Paris to provide an American point of view for a French marketing company. Through the course of the show, the firm takes on clients from several industries and helps them sell their products using several advertisement approaches. This show comes with a lot of creative ideas that can be incorporated into the real world. Emily's experience in the field is tested fully in this series, and she manages to navigate through these challenges every single time. All while juggling her love life and friendship.

2. Mad Men

While the first series mentioned in this list focuses on modern marketing, Mad Men is more about the inner workings of agency management in the 1960s. It also features the process of fostering client interactions and management. Mad Men is set in the fictional Sterling Copper advertising agency; a company focused on how advertising strategies evolved in the early days and how they influenced social and cultural shifts. If you think there isn't much to learn about the old advertisement ways, then you're in for so much surprise. Throughout the series, viewers see the creation of several fictional but emblematic advertising campaigns, such as the memorable "I'd Like to Buy the World a Coke" campaign.

3. Steve Jobs

Steve Jobs is a biographical drama that portrays Jobs' life story and the many challenges he faced before his big break. Being a popular American businessman and one of the richest in the tech industry, Steve Jobs is one many see as an inspiration and model figure. This movie was released to give some closure to these categories of people, showcasing the backstory of his successes. It shows several failed attempts, challenges, setbacks, and promotion steps taken to build the second-best phone manufacturing company, Apple. This movie is ideal for creators and business owners in the tech space.

4. Marketing Media Money

5. The Social Network

The film shows how understanding and catering to a specific target audience — in this case, Harvard students — can lead to rapid adoption and success. The initial exclusivity helped create a buzz and a sense of elitism around Facebook. It also demonstrates another marketing approach that was taken to put the Facebook app in the mainstream.
