

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Martina Reisz Newberry: Three Poems

Martina Reisz Newberry · Wednesday, July 29th, 2020

SUBSEQUENCE

I have brought you here so you will know forever/The silences which are our beginnings

~Eaven Boland

Look here, my years don't make of me a footnote, not a semi-mystic, not an elder "woman poet,"
nor am I a poetESS.
ESS indeed...
ESS does not fit the
largeness of my anger,
the uncomfortable clarity
of my voice.
ESSes do not strafe your eyes with a battery of code words for passion. ESSes are not breathing walking
cauldrons of love, drive and death;
they are not incendiary, fierce, judiciously choosing life—no matter how ruinous, how terrifying—rather than a marshmallow death strung out over years seated pleasantly and unseen on a cushion.
Listen up! Keep your ESSes.
My years are no
indication of the violence
to which I've testified, the wars I've detested,
the poverty and ineligibility
I've fought unsuccessfully.

I am not become unbeautiful or anonymous or resigned because of my 70-plus years around the sun.
 I began in silence
 (similar to ESS, no?)
 as too many of us do,
 but have not stayed there and I won't return there.
 That/those which/who have given me cause to regret have only done that one little thing.
 They have not killed me.
 If there is killing to be done,
 I will do it. Try me out, read what I say.
 If I bleed, do not doubt it,
 you will drown.

*

ME AND AMY LOWELL

U.S. Officially Enters War With Yemen
 — Headline from Common Dreams News 10/14/2016

Again we make living beings into silage—less than silage really—ash.
 Again our young soldiers polish the boots of senators and congressmen with blown-to-bits rags of robes, dresses, trousers, diapers.

Ours is now the land from which nothing is born. We cannot sing of sunflowers if they've all been deflowered, devoured by scorpions.
 The Good suffer an affliction of the spirit, the Wicked suffer nothing.

Once, we were our own talismans.
 Once we flung our jackets over our shoulders, boarded home-going trains with confidence in our home-grown courage.
 Once I wanted to be Amy Lowell
...all tremulous with hope and wistful joy for something that is sure to come at last...

*cradling the future in a glorious past.

Now I look through chaos for someone to quote and/or Be. I've outlived the sleight-of-hand, the constant gestures, the backstreet bullying from a psychopath empire disguising itself as America.

In the end, our Ms. Lowell was right.
We have all lost too often, too much, too many, in a pattern called war.
The ugly query stands:
Christ! What are patterns for?

(Italicized quotes are from Amy Lowell's poem Patterns, first published in a monthly magazine called "The Little Review" in August 1915.)

*

BY AND LARGE

The sun is faithful, tries to recall why it cannot bleach out terror from the planet. Every day it stands tall, confident that THIS will be the day all squalor burns off the earth after dewpoint. Poor sun... the minutes proceed, the hours jet by, and though the light on water is fine and bright, though shadows chase each other among the sunlit trees, so little changes. There is some reparage when shards of sun warm a shivering dog or heat the sidewalk under a homeless citizen. Still,
by and large (as my dad used to say), very little changes. At 5 pm, the sun speaks. Sorry, it says, failure .
is mine. I'll try again tomorrow.
Please understand the implications of my strife, all the implications of my struggle, are in the stars. Stay where you are. Stay tuned. I may return.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, July 29th, 2020 at 10:53 am and is filed under Poetry.
You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can skip to the end and leave a response. Pinging is currently not allowed.

