The Last Birthday Gift

my father gave my mother was a pistol. Small, like her.

Who did he imagine
she would have to become?

The Miracle Mobile

is running on fumes, and the check engine light came on 70 miles back. But this is not about the car that left me stranded just outside of Big Bend, is it? It's a metaphor for all the ways I push my luck by not going to the doctor or putting the address in while driving. I'm kidding. ish.

When I turned the key in Marfa, it sounded a little funny—a slight hiss somewhere buried in the engine like a cancer in a body. Most tragedies begin with ignoring. Maybe you know this scene well: boots out the window and swamp-assed in the backseat of a car with no AC under the merciless Texan sun, waiting for AAA, when I finally begin to signal to all the parts of my life I've ignored that wound up costing me sums too large to pay, at least up-front or in full. I'm supposed to tell you about the sweet days of youth, losing my V card, the bitterness of aging, hardness of living, scraping for money, losing god.
But, I figure it shook out alright.
Maybe even better than I could've hoped, should I wind up picked apart by vultures before I'm rescued. It's not that acceptance is easy for me, it's that I'm really tired of trying to pump this thing full when a valve is loose—maybe a leak? Who knows? The answer is buried beneath the engine. And even when the oily AAA guy pops the hood, poking around inside like a medic digging for bullets, and says "I'm real sorry, it's all gone to shit.

You'll have to tow and junk it." It'll be cool. I'll be cool.
I'll dig through the compartments of the car like a thief.
I know what I'll have to face when I haul my big ass up and into Oily's truck.
He'll say—more ponderingly than mean:
"Shouldn't those old things have another 100,000 on 'em? You must've been too rough with it."
At that point, should I come clean?
Should I tell him that once, I forgot to change the oil for quite some time, and when I finally remembered to check it—thousands of miles over the prescribed limit—the dipstick was bone-dry but that the car was still running like a dream on dreams? Maybe the last prayer that the miracle mobile ran on was its own for me: that one day I could bury its body in peace, knowing it would've wanted me to arrive home in one piece, into and through my own body.
