Goat Song

I thought I found a portal to another dimension, looking into the eyes of an hour-old goat.
Peter had called us to his farm that morning to help decide on a name: Bowie or Prince—both recently lost. The kid soft as a dust cloth, supple as a ribbon. His hooves smelled like bread.
I fought the urge to inhale or smother him.
This riddle in my arms, making me feel more like a guest in the world than an inhabitant of fifty years. I wanted to rewind his one hour, to follow his trail back to that unknown we must share in common. Could he reveal secrets, maybe tell me how to go home—this furry Ouija board. Surely his explanations would diminish the wonder of Peter's frog pond.
I posed for another photograph with the newly crowned Prince while Peter sighed like a critic.
Don't get too close, he said. And when I gasped, he scolded, This is a farm, not a petting zoo.

“Scientists identify 29 planets where aliens could observe Earth” ~ The Guardian and suffering from human-centrism,

I wonder what they'll make of our love.

Assuming romance is an Earthly concept,
a quirk or deficiency unique to our species.

Maybe we look cute and ridiculous like a puppy humping a throw pillow.

Or as terrifying as a Praying Mantis snapping off the head of her mate.

If aliens can muster pity, will they weep while they watch us falter and repeat?

Who knows—their research might be driven by a longing to imitate us, technological advancements having suppressed their primitive instincts, and we'll help recall the carnal urge.

Imagine them staging reenactments:

Our clumsy liaisons as How-To seminars.
Who am I kidding—they likely seeded us with the onus as a mere experiment.

I wonder if they'll share the findings,

teaching us to unlearn our signature snag.

Unrequited Love Song

It's not that I have been alone—
it's that I have been without you.
This love, a disco flattened before it ever flickered. A pomegranate tossed after being bitten all wrong.
It's not that I have been alone—
it's that anybody else would've felt like an almost, an echo of normal.
A belly blistered by the caress of doubt. If you visit my grotto, you won't find Mary but you will find faith. A shrine that nods to what could have been, an immense place that never will be large enough to hold what has been missed.
