Odu Ode: Two Poems

Odu Ode · Saturday, August 29th, 2020

late candle or undoing our colonization we left our smiles on other people's teeth — it fitted them

like a souvenir of groceries.

& when we tried
retrieving them,
they've been embalmed & soaked in the mien

of a clan
consumed by carnage

we hoped we never inherit back what we lost to chivalry — empurpled wax spray her semen upon our womb until we procreated hate after hate after hate after hate after hate
after hate after hate after hate... till we lost our wombs & ovaries & everything that holds foetus & toddlers
& & & kids

writing to my clans or reminding my shadow of them

Dear Shadow,

i am an offspring of four clans:
a rope / formaldehyde / open wounds / saltwater you know every fold in my flesh where i tuck my weaknesses

into broken shards of my heart.

now, that you know the size of my bed // and areas in my pillows // wet with my regrets // please // do not wash my linen // in a thirsty lake i call you dear forcing my tongue to fit into lies it fails to recognize like a mien of doubt i live to tell my stories backwardly die don't please day this on heart my when you only recognizes my doubts are empurpled by doubts / but you are a calligraphy of another song / of demons escaping our body / another hope / another flower we buried in epidermis of a smile we'd wear /tomorrow / or a day after tomorrow / or a day after / or a week to come / or a month / or a year/ or in the grave / or our bones / or the trees that'd grow on us / or our fears / or our chiseled tongues / or ...
