

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Oh, How Bigly the Ugly Have Risen

Sylvie · Wednesday, November 16th, 2016

Until November 8, Jon Robin Baitz's Vicuña at the Kirk Douglas Theatre was a clever and acutely topical satire that took its cues from pretty amusing current events. Or so we thought. Since November 8, that satire has curdled into tragedy, depending on which side of the nation's Great Divide you stand. More remarkable even than the room the playwright had made for the possibility of such a real-life outcome, the results of our recent presidential election will impact how you respond to the play — whether you laugh, fan your face or cry.

Because now Vicuña is a comedy with a secondary bite — much more stinging than it was before. It's a be-careful-what-you-didn't-wish-for kind of comedy, since its ending will most likely have you choking on your laughter. It is a blistering farce wrapped in a cautionary tale about the improbable rise of an improbable presidential candidate. That he's a dangerous man incapable of maturity, whose toys have to be taken away from him so he won't harm himself, is probably more than you need to be told. He also has an unquenchable ego, money that only dogs can hear (to quote another play), and a smart daughter Srilanka (Samantha Sloyan), named for the place where she presumably was conceived, who would like to shield her father from himself, until she can't.

The events that unfurl beyond this point will not be described here because the outcome of November 8 has affected every fiber of the play. It cannot be entirely the same satire that I saw before the election. What I can tell you is that director Robert Egan has turned in a finely tuned production that plays out in the Manhattan atelier of Anselm Kassir (Brian George), also known as Anselme de Paris, an immigrant bespoke tailor to the ultra rich. (The handsomely appointed set is by the ubiquitous Kevin Depinet, with costumes humorously designed by Laura Bauer, lighting by Tom Ontiveras and music and sound by Karl Fredrik Lundberg).

Samantha Sloyan and Ramiz Monsef in Vicuña at the Kirk Douglas Theatre.

It falls to the savvy Harry Groener to play the vulgar real estate magnate, Kurt Seaman, with uncanny persuasion and a galling panache. Kurt's views on everything are, of course, ignorant, extreme and unwisely — if skillfully — challenged by Anselm's assistant, the all-too-smart Muslim Harvard dropout Amir (Ramiz Monsef, remembered for his other striking performance in last year's Guards at the Taj at the Geffen). These two gladiators end up locked in a clash of political postures — a manipulation that, pre-election, would have kept you tittering on the edge of your seat. Post-election? Well...it can't help but still fascinate, primarily because of the elegant diatribes, performances and the final promise/threat made by the protean mogul.

The production gets the right added support from the balance of its small cast, which includes a lot of standing around quietly on the sidelines. It also benefits from a thanklessly hilarious, but well-handled performance by Linda Gehringer as the hapless Kitty Finch-Gibbon, delegated by her more craven legislative colleagues to try to dissuade the Big Man from running. Good luck with that.

Harry Groener and Linda Gehringer in Vicuña at the Kirk Douglas Theatre.

That Baitz wrote Vicuña at all had to be the explosive culmination of his exasperation with an endlessly disturbing election — or a deliberate enough-is-enough act of calculated defiance. I have no idea which — and it hardly matters.

What makes the play so remarkable as well as a little macabre is not just that the verbal sparring is so well argued by all parties, but also that, in light of the real election results, its fungible ending now also can be seen as ominously prophetic. What were once mere political implications have solidified into unimaginable realities.

There is a comment section at the end of this short essay. If you have seen this production, feel free to use it and kick off a larger conversation. Who knows? Depending on what that universal reality show called Life has in store, this little piece may demand to be continued...

Top image: l-r, Samantha Sloyan, Harry Groener, Ramiz Monsef and Brian George in Vicuña at the Kirk Douglas Theatre.

Photos by Craig Schwartz.

WHAT: Vicuña

WHERE: Kirk Douglas Theatre, 9820 Washington Blvd., Culver City, CA 90232.

WHEN: Tuesday-Friday, 8pm; Saturday 2 & 8pm; Sunday 1 & 6:30pm. Ends Nov 20.

HOW: Tickets: $25-$70 (subject to change), available by phone at 213.628.2772 or online at www.CenterTheatreGroup.org.

AND ON A PERSONAL NOTE...

Dear Friends, Subscribers, Readers,

Culturalweekly.com — CW — is fun. It's smart. It has exciting contributors in a diversified field of cultural interest. It is a serious, offbeat intelligent place for comment on a wide range of topics. No limits, no limitations. And it offers writers the kind of freedom that spurs creativity.

CW's goal, as you know by now, is to "elevate the conversation." You don't have to be told how desperately that conversation needs elevating. If the presidential election taught us nothing else, it taught us that our minds need a lot better nourishment.

Oases such as CW lift up the spirit and soothe the soul. If you agree, help us keep it alive. It has gone nonprofit and accepts donations in any amount as a sponsored project of Fractured Atlas, a nonprofit arts service org.

Your contribution is tax-deductible to the extent permitted by law.

<https://nextecho.org/donate/>

Donating online allows you to select a one-time or monthly donation. We hope you will consider doing either. Think of this: if people 250 donate $5 a month, we meet our goal. If you give more, the math gets even easier.

<https://nextecho.org/donate/>

If you prefer to donate by check, donations must be made payable to "Fractured Atlas" and mailed to 215 South Santa Fe Ave., #19, Los Angeles, CA 90012.

Whatever you decide, we at CW wish you a serene Thanksgiving and are grateful for your ongoing loyalty and support.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, November 16th, 2016 at 3:56 pm and is filed under Theatre, Discourse

You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.