Pacyinz Lyfoung: Three DC Poems

For the Petworth Chronicles or Poetry Log...

By the time you read this, this place may be gone or saved, and with it, the people who make this community holistic in all its laughter, solidarity and fights, yes, fights too, outbursts of heart-wrenching fights about having no money to be in the store, about credit cards being declined, about giving people a job if you want them to pay.

The belligerent last stands of people down to the wire.

The jokes of the store owner diffuse situations while holding the business line, and yet, despite the skirmishes for the survival of each in this urban jungle, and despite the store owner's background as a new immigrant from Africa, still— respect for each other's humanity, and the fellowship of blackness, a tie of brotherhood more like a sense of neighborhood united against the tide of gentrification; a shared raft for those left on the margins of the city's prosperity.

Through this open door, their few dollars can still afford the pink of bottled soda or the orange of bottled juice or the alluring amber of liquor, small drops of joy, safe bubbles, rocking amidst the stormy madness of daily lives excluded and alienated as economic refugees in their own Chocolate City.

Today, a messenger, lily-white like a funeral, came through the door:

a most unusual and unexpected sight in this black store on one of the last historically-black, well historically-black as in inner city co-existence between Asian grocery stores that served black neighborhoods for 20 years after the riots emptied the city shopping blocks. (But I digress, although to correct the Asian-Black shared history erasure.)

What purpose might the lily-white messenger have? Maybe he made a mistake? Alas, no mistake for this stealth carrier dropping the bomb of the new white landlord's eviction court papers, coming to sink this last black community buoy.

Their SOS intersected with the trajectory of my search for justice, I, child of refugees of the Vietnam War (actually, for my Hmong ethnic family, more like the CIA Secret War in Laos), still burning with the fire of redress from my parents' forced exile, as we speak the same language: of displacement. But my legalese clouds my eyes with the specter of unfriendly rules, so as the store owner carries his heavy cases of happiness bottled in rainbow colors, he says, "you fear because you care a lot, and that's good, but we have justice on our side, so we fight", and he reminds me:

we, war refugees and immigrant or local economic refugees, we also share the language of hope and faith against all odds.

Chronicles of Ward 4

I.

In DC Ward 4, the Crestwood buzzes like a Babylon Tower, with the sounds of every corner of the world sharing walls singing Middle Eastern melodies, Latin salsa and Kdrama soundtracks, these latters escaping from this Hmong poet's lonely days in the Capital city. The common hallways and elevators lilt with greetings accented by tongues from faraway places courteously exchanging hellos and have a good one! Sending the warmth of belonging to one human family sheltering together in this rent-controlled, multifamily complex, this oasis of safe and affordable housing, we all call home.

II.

The Petworth Safeway's high ceilings and spacious aisles display vividly multi-colored flowers, pastel ceramic vases, shimmery balloons for every life celebration, grocery store luxuries delighting the senses before strolling through rows of produce piling fruit gems among green leaves divided by root veggies, lined in the back by dried nuts: picture perfect, it feels like stepping into a suburban store, but in the inner city, and staffed by busy locals who seem to love their jobs, making fresh food available to their neighbors, like this Hmong poet who beelines here to find the best mangoes, blushing red on yellow or dark emerald green, they look nothing like the mangoes from her uncle's garden in Laos, but they still taste like her one trip to the land of her ancestors, transported just one metro station away from her country-that-could-have been.

III.

On new roads smooth like purple plum skin or old roads cracked like acorn shells crushed by the passage of vehicles, she bikes the intraveins of the city, circumvents traffic juggernauts, seeks the shade of tree canopies. Hair flying in the breeze dancing with petals showering in spring or golden gingko leaves sweeping in autumn, on her route, row houses slip by one by one.

Each a precious pearl humming with the secret of life stringing one neighbor to the other in the circle of community. Up Upshur, past 16th Street, she marvels at the cherry tree dangling with ruby red earrings where pink blush blossoms used to wave in the wind, now they ring summer that greets her at the intersection randomly sown with wild prairie seeds, blooming in a splash of salmon and white and red poppies: mesmerized, she descends from her faithful aluminum Trek steed and embraces her Western namesakes—as she reaches for their wrinkled paper thin silk softness, she feels her grandmother's fingers gently patting her hand, welcoming her home.

National Croissant Day in DC

I.

His was the earthiness of bread not the flakiness of croissant.

Seeds, and oil, and brown flour, with a pinch of salt, and hands that kneaded dough with the patience of français de souche, not the ones touted by nationalist purists as the only true French rooted to French soil, but the French from the farmlands, not tall from generations of laboring between the moist soil and the golden sun and growing a heart big like shared bread.

Mostly, his, was the comfort of bread, soft and steady under the color and flavor of jam, butter, paté, cheese, his beloved wife and friends, including me, his fellow French American.

II.

When money no dey, everybody run away,
When money no dey, nobody look at my face,

Sings Timaya in Nigerian Afrobeat.

As Sherif sways and shuffles, clothed in canvas splattered with colors dancing from his brushes to his coverall, the sun's heat increases with each of his strokes and like butterflies trembling in the frozen air we gravitate to his light melting the winter icy chill warming up to the painter touching up his painting.

Voilà. escapes from his mouth and I ask,

Do you speak French? I mean, Parlez vous français?

Oui, I grew in Paris, says he, I grew up in Bordeaux, Says I, oh, smile we, finding us French Americans.

Do you know it's National Croissant Day? Says I.

Really, says he, good thing I ate my croissant this morning!

I will write a poem about you, is that cool?, says I.

D'accord, says he, and au revoir, say we.

III.

French farming/landowner/husband of an American

Côte d'Ivoire immigrant/Parisian child/ex-boyfriend of an American

French born/child of Hmong refugees/hmoob fabkis/from Laos

One of us is now a lovely memory

One of us is a street artist

One of us is a poet

In DC on National Croissant Day: We, French Americans
