Looking in People's Houses

My wife thinks it's creepy of me, & I admit, she's probably right. Still, it doesn't stop me when we take our nightly walks around the neighborhood.
 It's not that I'm out to compare anything or hope to catch a glimpse of some good-looking woman in a towel crossing her hallway (which would be perverted after all), & I don't do it in the way my mom used to make my dad drive around rich neighborhoods, as some masochistic maneuver to make themselves feel inadequate.
 "It's just creepy," says my wife.
 But I can't help myself.
 I want to see how people spend their nights.
 How they sit in their family rooms. What they hang on their walls. I want to see the different body language between different husbands & different wives – do they sit close together, or are they like my parents who fell asleep on separate couches watching television every night? I want to see what people eat for dinner.
 Are they drinking wine? Screaming at each other?
 Picking their nose? What are they thinking about?
 Are they anxious? Sick? Tired? Hopeless?
 "Look," says my wife, tugging on my arm & trying to lure my attention from one of the houses,

“you can see a lot of stars tonight.”
 But tonight I’m less interested in my neighbors trillions of miles away than I am those much closer to me, who tell me all I need to know about the universe.

Photo Composition

it’s the way his hips poke out, one foot resting a little to the side, holding more of his weight than the other, his large right hand holding onto a hat, wearing an ill-fitting suit which looks sexy on him, dressing him for this wedding day, and she, beside him, in a satiny dress, slim, beautiful and probably smelling of wonderful perfume, that makes me feel their love and need of each other, the direct ““here we are” into the camera and then, eighty-one years of age later, older than history and opportunity, separated by ill health and finally ,by death, he fumbles and trips over life and falls into that mystery orchestrated by an unknown song where she has gone.

Composition

illness is such a distraction, so he puts headphones on and listens to music which is also a way to get to go other places. his dentist has offered it as well as his surgeon. when he takes the one he loves into his arms there is music, but also through its osmosis, a giving back of the delectable and perceived beat and the measure of small gratitudes.
