Three Portraits of the Artists:

degas between ballets

so often he captures
not the star performance, but the dancers, workers
really, at their classes, rehearsals, practices,
stretching out, sweating,
scratching their backs,
bored, awkward, tired,
and unbeautiful. all
the hard , unglamorous routine that goes into producing the aesthetic illusion, the momentary transcendence of the dreary here-and-now, the transformation of our greasy, pimpled, aching matter into a form that briefly matters.

paul klee: schoolgirls, outdoors,

children should not smoke cigars.
children should not be cigars.
children should not become cigars.

these are metaphysical givens.
 some children have two heads.
 some children are tow heads.
 some children have one head, but four eyes. some children have three eyes apportioned over one-and-a half heads.
 some children have stovepipes for heads. some children's heads are violet, while other children gradually become indistinguishable from the background coloration (like chameleons, but irreversible).
 some children are the color of ether:
 these are known as "ethereal." thus, some children remain part of a cosmic consciousness (which is monochrome), while others become adults, individuals, separated by broad brushstrokes and a color of their own, one different from that of the world and those of their fellow adults. they are then allowed to smoke cigars. this is a pataphysical certainty.
 it was a good year for schoolgirls to go back indoors, but they didn't.

amedeo modigliani: servant girl,

wispy hair, prim dress, clunky boots:
 eyes (and expectations) cast beneath the middle distance.
 hands comforting each other. but the sensitivity to stimulation of the lips, cheeks, ears, and (always) curving, elongated neck remind us that our uniforms can only temporarily obscure what are not uniform:
 the naked truths of our nerve endings, our erogenous zones and erectile tissues.
 thus, a servant girl's a girl (a woman is a woman)
 for all that.
