Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Sara Borjas: Two Poems

Sara Borjas · Wednesday, August 30th, 2017

Sara Borjas is a Fresno poet and third-generation Chicana. She is a Community of Writers at Squaw Valley Workshop Fellow and a 2017 CantoMundo Fellow. She received the 2015 Blue Mesa Poetry Prize for her poem, "Half-Elegy for My Mother's Voice." She digs space & time, memory, aromatics, tiny prints and oldiez. Her most recent poetry can be found in The Offbeat, Calamity, The Acentos Review and Luna Luna. She is a lecturer in the Creative Writing Department at UC Riverside.

[alert type=alert-white] Please consider making a tax-deductible donation now so we can keep publishing strong creative voices.[/alert]

Loving Poets

for Eduardo & Kaveh

I listen to your last line like it's oldiez like Smokey or Summer, drinking a chela, doing that special listening. When news comes, you are in my arms entirely. I love you with an enormous trumpet where my face should be. Your titles are water

I filled a garbage can with & swam in as a girl & you do not spill one drop. Your line breaks rattle even my broken windows. Ghosts love your essential jokes. Your breath makes the sound of my own footsteps arriving at the shadow of twelve open doors.

Your first drafts are like god's drool. Your spirit like sugared conchas. Your stare solid as the intention of my grandma Delfina's last breath.

Your confusion each star shaking its crystal tambourine. Your line breaks my bones with rhythm. Your poems, the silence the dead and just born leave.

Your interior is akin to warp speed. Your poems like expensive, suede jumpsuits

I would like to dress my heart up in. It would take a million deaths of every flower alive to make me stop loving you. It would take the disappearance of every broken rock, every grain of sand, every elegant finger on every woman.

It would take the horns of every oldie ballad, every Tower of Power song, the police breaking up every backyard barbeque ever, every one of my mouths run dry, my mother's luscious voice collapsing to make me not look for you again

My Name Disappears from the Script

My name was given in the middle of a night black as the back of my grandmother's knees: joints burn in my parent's hands—one end to another—and smoke weaves them together on the hood of a car—because I like to dream people up the way I want them.

Because I am a girl with a car that barely runs, a girl with long hair, a girl with short hair, a girl who cannot make up her mind, a girl who cries during commercials where families sit around a dinner table, who looks away. A girl with mismatched boobs. A girl who's never loved her dogs, who talks to her parents like children. A girl who drinks too much. And my feet hurt.

So I dream myself up behind this bar and make you black sangrias.

I talk too much—I say my name.

I mix all the racket—who I want to be, who I am: no wife, no absent mother, no child of mine will ever be threatened, no woman's spitting image, no man's model of love, no one's daughter, no one's daughter.

God is still asleep and this is her drunk & dreaming.

I want to be gone before she wakes up.

If the name is a spirit, then Sara is the absence—of Abraham or anyone's wife or the obligation to the story that God gets drunk on and retells on lonely nights.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, August 30th, 2017 at 10:36 pm and is filed under Poetry You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments (RSS) feed. You can skip to the end and leave a response. Pinging is currently not allowed.