

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Billy Burgos: Those Small Boxes of Infatuation

Billy Burgos · Tuesday, October 22nd, 2013

Billy Burgos is an active member of The Anansi Writer's Workshop and a mainstay in the local L.A. poetry scene. He has been published in numerous journals both in print and online. Billy is the co-editor of the poetry Broadsheet Sic 3 and has served as poetry facilitator of The Beyond Baroque poetry workshop as well as the host of The First Sunday Reading a monthly reading at Beyond Baroque Literary Centre in Venice Ca. In 2009 Billy was chosen as newer poet to watch by the L.A. Poetry Festival. His first collection of poetry titled Eulogy to an Unknown Tree was published by Writ Large Press in January 2013.

Cultural Weekly is proud to premier these poems by Billy Burgos.

Matter

Today on the radio while driving a scientist gives me a round number that is the supposed age of the universe.
He tells me how Matter only makes up a small portion of its expanse.

.

He tells me of a glowing light in some corner of space that is emitting a heat signature from an explosion that started life billions of years before we were ever particles.

.

Somehow the busy street now appears smaller. I am a simple man. I can only see the universe as a black box with dark angles that never meet. I picture myself as a speck of dust floating aimlessly.

.

Then this feeling collecting in the fist of my heart. What should I make of it now, this worthless bit of emotion and quark?

.

There are only a few things I know for sure:

I care too much about my eventual outcome,
 I forgive others sparingly and dole out love in a similar way, the California sky today is the bluest I have ever seen.

.
 The scientist continues to speak but by then I am somewhere else. Transfixed by all the different back sides of cars flashing red brake lights. Cars in the distance as far as the eye can see. And I am repeating to myself the words of some horribly made-up tune, as inconsequential as a speck of dust blowing about,

.

.
*“my matter matters today,
 but only for today
 does my matter matter.”*

The Figurative Heart

We blame the heart so often.
 We ask it to bear our guilt like a wet bag of sand, then to hold those small boxes of infatuation.
 We ask the heart to lie to us right behind the request to keep the tune of our spirit playing on.
 Yet when it lies, we blame that muscle for each remembered deception.
 At this red hour, with the darkening city unrolling slowly like a dirty rug, there is no figurative heart. There is only this-and-now, the entire machine.
 Even the threading of streetlights that appear to lead off into nothingness eventually end and come back. The night always brings back.
 And maybe another -the heart only speaks through the juried soul, that invisible conduit that can bear nothing.
 Like faith it is only an assured expectation, something not-yet-beheld. We cannot call it a liar, we can only call it god.

Mid(dle) Life Crisis

We grow up thinking of our bodies as the vehicle that carries us.

These little ignorant engines, whirring along some meager passageway

.
knowing nothing of the “how”
or the “why” but singing loudly nonetheless. Then at some improbable point, somewhere past the center of

.
our lives we find ourselves in a quiet field with a small wind smoothing back all the tall bushes. And we can see clearly how many times sadness has punched us raw,

.
clearly how many times we have lit the light of some greater love.
Only then do we realize that emotion is the vehicle, the true soul-without-sight.

.
Our grown body, merely a windblown sail that has driven us without direction. But so what if this is so? What truly matters then is not the epiphany but what it has become,

.
some pliable mass, like a handful of putty squeezed so tight that all its color has blended into one beige tone. There is no precipice or prize.
There is only us holding-the-gold in this silent field

.
and the tall figure of a man in the distance waving us in to what we believe to be home.

This entry was posted on Tuesday, October 22nd, 2013 at 11:59 am and is filed under Poetry.
You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.