The Best Ingredients for Your Skin

Our Friends · Friday, September 24th, 2021

Today's market is saturated with products to take care of your skin. Toners, moisturizers, antiaging creams, soaps...where does it all end? It can seem impossible to know what will actually help your skin thrive, and the wrong product can even cause damage. These are some ingredients that have been scientifically proven to enhance your skincare routine. You can look for products that use them as active ingredients.

Vitamin C

You're probably familiar with vitamin C as it's an essential antioxidant that's vital to our everyday functioning. But in addition to being a key component of your diet, it can also be applied externally to your skin. If you use a vitamin C serum, it only takes a few drops for your skin to become more naturally toned and hydrated. These serums can soothe irritation and, when used regularly, prevent further skin discoloration. There are also skincare products that combine vitamin C with other essential ingredients, giving you a well-rounded approach to taking care of your skin.

Hyaluronic Acid

Hyaluronic acid naturally occurs in your body, and you can also find it in a variety of skincare products. But what makes it so important? The most important aspect of this chemical is that it can absorb high amounts of water. When applied to your skin, it keeps your skin from becoming dried out by holding the moisture in. You don't have to worry about your moisture evaporating into the air.

Another key benefit is that it works to moisturize both dry and oily skin. People with oily skin often need to be careful about moisturizer, because it can clog the pores and cause breakouts. This substance is helpful in the dry months of the year, especially winter. Since most places have low humidity levels in the winter, your skin is more likely to become dehydrated. Indoor heating can also suck the water out of your skin.

Caffeine is another leading cause of dryness in skin. While you may not want, or be able to, cut down on caffeine intake you need to consider habits like this and how they affect your skin. This will help you determine the best products for not just your goals and skin type, but the other elements of your lifestyle as well. Since this acid locks in the moisture your skin needs its worth the research and consideration.

Retinol

Retinol is a substance derived from vitamin A. It has been prized by skincare companies and dermatologists alike because it works for all skin types. If you look for anti-aging products, you'll probably find retinol as the main ingredient in many of them. This substance causes your skin to produce more collagen. As you get older, you naturally lose collagen. The more collagen you have, the more you'll reduce the signs of aging and in some cases begin to look younger. On top of all of this, retinol is an antioxidant. It can help to reduce the appearance of visible sun damage and diminish fine lines and wrinkles.

Argan Oil

If you're looking for natural ingredients, argan oil is one of the top picks. No matter what skin type you have, there are benefits to this compound. It has vitamin E, carotenoids, and a light construction that makes it less heavy than other skincare oils. Argan oil has antioxidant properties that help fight skin damage and signs of aging. In addition, it is an anti-inflammatory substance. This means that it can help with things like acne breakouts, sun damage, redness, and other irritating flareups.
