Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Ron Koertge: "The Streetsweeper" & "Grand Avenue"

Ron Koertge · Thursday, February 16th, 2012

Ron Koertge has received many honors, including a fellowship from the National Endowment of the Arts and a California Arts council grant.

The Streetsweeper

goes by at 1:00 a.m. two nights of the week. I can hear the feather whoosh of his machine and see one red light.

I believe that the streetsweeper lives alone, sleeping through the cold days, waking clear-eyed and deft as the sun goes down.

I believe that he works steadily without a portable radio or a reading light or a nap. When he pauses it is to stare placidly into the potent night.

For reasons too numerous to mention, I think about the streetsweeper often and about the singular, provident cadence of his life.

Grand Avenue

When the Lexus hit that pigeon, he lay there beating his one good wing against the curb like he was trying to put out a fire.

My wife asked me to do something, so I turned his head clockwise until I heard a click. Then darkness poured out of the small safe of his body.

That is when I realized I used to merely love my wife.

Now I would kill for her.

This entry was posted on Thursday, February 16th, 2012 at 1:40 pm and is filed under Poetry You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments (RSS) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.