Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Tony Magistrale: Three Poems

Tony Magistrale · Wednesday, May 28th, 2014

Tony Magistrale is Professor of English at the University of Vermont. His most recent collection of poems, ENTANGLEMENTS, was published in 2013 by Fomite Press.

All poems are premiering on Cultural Weekly.

Milan

Because she sent out so many mixed messages, it's remarkable how deeply she ended up affecting me. Tourists, those who choose not to circumvent her completely, even natives who labor in her shops and office buildings, call her a dirty whore, and to her face; an old bitch gone in the teeth, as Pound snarled more than a century ago. And like a whore, they appreciate her value only in terms of generating money—but that's their loss, abandoning her for places more refined: north to Switzerland or the quaint little house in the suburbs. Scary and sometimes mean, she takes a cruel pleasure out of intimidating the naïve and unworldly, those lacking a thirst for adventure; if safety and comfort remain your primary considerations in a relationship, you would be well to look elsewhere. I came to Milan when I was 29, and susceptibly unjaded. All my life I'd lived in Disney World. Milan was my final rite of passage into adulthood. I'd been on an exclusive diet of compliant cheerleaders and pretty country rubes wearing pastel skirts. Milan was the first woman to show up for a date who was smarter and savvier than me, smoldering under heavy makeup and killer heels, chain-smoking her way through a multilingual dinner, and then pulling me into dark alleys for drunken French kissing. I hated her for a long time before I realized I was in love with her—vampiric and unapologetic, she could punish with impunity, as in the used clusters of bloodied heroin needles I found discarded each morning curbside outside my apartment building. But because I stuck around long enough, she taught me things I never would have learned some place else: that glamour could lurk beneath a black veil of dust—and that while you may be young only once, the memory of a beautiful woman, and the city where she resides, remains immutable to age.

Madame Bovary in L.A.

"Where could she have learned such depravities, so deep and so dissembled that they were almost incorporeal?"

—Gustave Flaubert

Slave to love, a century too early
To join the Kardashians or headline her own celebrity
TV series, but cued into sex as currency:
What good is beauty if you can't profit from it?

Amid breathless kisses in winter mist, surreptitious Liaisons in French hotels, always the restive urge To smack someone—husband, lover, creditors, daughter. Scandalous behavior that shocked the perimeters of being Female—Flaubert fantasied about her as a mistress But how long could he have put up with her? Shopping for supper buzzed on illicit sex, Unapologetically enthralled by the magnificent Appearances of things. Troubled trophy-wife, Disgruntled diva whose appetite to consume Dwarfed husband's efforts to constrain. Should have Been born a Material Girl in L.A.,

Indulging expensive fits of luxury during trips
To Neiman Marcus & Saks, swiping plastic talismans
With manicured fingers as items disappear from racks,
A sad smile creasing her meticulously made up face.

In Praise of Muses

i.

She wondered, why would anyone want to be a Muse? What kind of satisfaction is there servicing someone else's flame? I tried to explain in terms she would likely appreciate. It's about wielding power, ultimate control over the production line.

She responded, birthing is so overrated.

It's unappreciated toil and sacrifice and pain;

no woman is ever sufficiently warned. And, in the end, the child leaves, leaving you more alone than before. This is often true, I acknowledged, both of children and Muses, what matters most is what they leave behind. Who knew better than Keats, whose Muse gave birth in sadness to children of memory and loss, but children also of exceptional beauty who still dance on the dust of their parents' graves.

ii.

Amidst the great bundled burden that January bears you arrive like a delivery of Florida hot house flowers

& my frozen black & white world cracks open in the heat of your shining surfaces.

It is as if I have been granted sudden entrance into the sequestered garden of a great painter's studio—Matisse might do nicely—where the painter & I privately tour together one May morning his bright canvases, admiring the spring violets, the reds & blues on various panels lining his walls.

I am aware
you have just spent hours alone
working with your own brushes & paint to prepare yourself for our meeting.
I see mirrored in your smoky-lidded eyes & berry-stained smile

your own pleasure & skills

at transforming yourself into such a spectacular canvas, more beautiful than any I can recall.

I am, in turn, possessed of no better compliment, no more profound a gesture of appreciation, than the compulsion to pull your dazzling face into intimate contact with mine, kissing the contours of your deeply ornamented eyes, cheeks, and mouth until both of us are smeared with color, like the happy palette of Matisse himself, who created new beauty from everything he destroyed.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, May 28th, 2014 at 5:35 pm and is filed under Poetry You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments (RSS) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.