Our Friends · Friday, July 16th, 2021

The oil painting method was first discovered by western countries like France, The United States, and The United Kingdom, among others, in the 12th century. This was much after Asian countries like Afghanistan, India started using it in the early 4th century. Once discovered, Europeans took it as a frenzy and loved oil paintings as if they were waiting for some miracle that eventually took place!

Artists used chalk drawings as a basis for oil pigments. They applied paint repeatedly as layers to ensure that it did not flake. Due to this reason, it took years or even decades for classic artwork to get ready for a museum wall. Therefore, art lovers worldwide saw oil paintings with revered eyes and considered it as a brand value that they couldn't wait to bring home.

With such a highly placed perspective, it is easy to deduct that oil paintings were immensely popular in the past 200 years. Hence, more the reason for the curious soul to bring home such artwork would lighten up their moods and bring joy to the house. These masterpieces didn't only make careers out of artists but also catapulted oil paintings and their demand into a worldwide phenomenon.

After all, who wouldn't be happy to bring home a painting of Julius Ceasar, at one-tenth the cost?

How are authenticity and source different? Well, authenticity is all about the artist and the art whereas the source is about the right, authorized seller or distributor of the product. If you have your sources sorted when you buy art, you have no reason to complain. Just make sure you buy enough oil paintings to decorate your house.

One study has suggested that the source of buying art is one of the biggest reasons for any art lover to be happy. Why?
